American newspapers ought not to publish such monarchical propaganda, or if they do publish it they ought also to publish a short editorial article with each one, showing how the royal person assumes to govern other human beings without their consent, and generally should show up the uselesaness of such people in the world, and how they live on the sweat of others' brows, &c.

Dr. Frederick W. Norwood, pastor of the City Temple in London, spoke yesterday on "Democracy and Religion" at a luncheon of the Federation of Churches in his honor at the Hotel Astor. In this vein he warned the church against affiliating itself too closely with any form of government or any principles other than those formulated in Christian doctrines.

"Ministers should not hand themselves over to any party, but should keep to the fundamental principles of truth and justice," he said. "If the church should hand itself over unrevervedly to democracy to-day the future generations might judge us as we have been judged in the past. One of the greatest fallings of the church in the past has been that it connected itself too closely with the throne and later with the aristocracy, and because of

To THE NEW YORK HERALD: "Paddy Duffy's Cart" was sung in the play "Squatter Sovereignty," which was the second produced in the Theater Comique which had a run of more than eix months in 1883. I was a madrigal boy in the company and sang with eleven others in blackface and Continental suits "The Veteran Guard Cadets," our cue being given by Johnny Wild and the scene being Coney Island.

But to return to "Paddy Duffy's Cart," let me quote a letter to me by the late John Sparks, who was one of company: "'Paddy Duffy's Cart' was sung by George Merritt, William Merritt, John Oberist and James Fox of Goss and the cart, while George Merritt sang the song and they all joined in the chorus."

The cart was a peddler's wagon and stood at the foot of a flight of steps
